

Document Research Group is in the highly confidential business of evaluating the true disposition of a document so that it can be authenticated. To maintain our private position we may only be contacted via the email address above noted. We advise under the umbrella of strict secrecy for various police and financial institutions world wide. As should be expected in this business we provide no references from our clients as we maintain client confidentiality and adhere to non-disclosure agreements to the letter of the law.

Problems with a document arise when that document illustrates discrepancies in simultaneous ink impressions, aging of the paper, idiom incongruities, erasures, alterations, obliteration's, ridge impressions, and issues related to print layering processes that may determine a document is either authentic or fraudulent. Twenty five years in this business classifies us as skilled numismatists.

Document Research Group, hereinafter referred to as DRG, is expert in the research process when verifying financial instruments such as bonds, treasury notes and other similar financial documents at issue. In-house we are equipped to analyze various types of paper and ink to determine if they are authentic or have been modified and/or been adjusted, either fraudulently or legally. Some of our methodology involves photographic scanning, black light and/or infrared light investigation, side optical scan profile study, and spectrum photo analysis. Combining these methodologies with our research capability generally provides us the information necessary to determine instrument origin and historical ownership, leading to the prospect of discovering current market value and present beneficial ownership of a document.

DRG is not comprised of practicing attorneys. No attorney-client relationship is entered into by retaining any of our services. If you seek legal advice, consult a licensed attorney located within your jurisdiction.
